

A background of soft-focus pink roses. The roses are in various stages of bloom, with some in sharp focus in the foreground and others blurred in the background. The overall tone is gentle and commemorative.

COMFORT AND CONCERN

How to support someone who is grieving

BY SUSAN CARVELL
Richmond Times-Dispatch Writer

Few experiences rival the pain and anguish of losing a person we cherish. Whether a family member, close confidant or long-time work colleague, the death of a loved one brings on overwhelming feelings of grief and loss.

It is often difficult to know just what to say to a person who is grieving. While our natural inclination is to offer expressions of condolence and comfort, many of us struggle to find the right words to convey our feelings. Oftentimes, we may feel at such a loss for words that we fail to reach out to someone at a time when a compassionate gesture would be most appreciated.

Even though it may be uncomfortable, our own unease should not prevent us from reaching out to someone. There are things we can say and do that will convey our care and concern to a grieving relative, friend or coworker.

How to approach someone who is grieving

It is always important to acknowledge a person's feelings of loss and express a gesture of caring for him or her. One of the best ways to let a person know you care is simply by showing that you are aware of their situation and feelings. The expression needn't be elaborate or complicated, it can be as simple as stating "I'm thinking of you" or "I'm sorry for your loss."

Often, a well-meaning person may shy away from mentioning the death of a loved one, but it's important to acknowledge that a loss has taken place. When words fail, writing a sympathetic note or giving a hug to someone we're close to can be gently comforting and helpful.

Be present

Asking if it is OK to sit in silence with a grieving person, perhaps holding a hand, can be one of the most compassionate gestures we can offer. If you are close to the person who is grieving, sharing a favorite poem, a reading from a faith tradition or a well-known or loved piece of music can be particularly meaningful and a source of comfort. It can also strengthen the bond between the two of you, helping the bereaved feel cared for and supported.

Be ready to listen

Many grief counselors emphasize that it is important not to shy away from allowing a grieving person to talk about the experience of loss. Often simply stating that you are sorry for someone's loss allows them the freedom to open up and begin to talk about how they are feeling. A person who has just suffered the death of a loved one is in a state of shock and needs to relive the moment as a means of processing his or her grief. This process helps the grief-stricken to reach a new reality where their loved one is no longer physically present.

Share your memories

If you also knew the person who has died, sharing a story or memory about him or her can be very meaningful to loved ones. Begin by using phrases such as "One thing I appreciated about her was...or We always had such fun doing... or I remember the time we..." Bringing up warm memories about the deceased can help lighten darker moments.

Mean what you say

Many times the first words to pop out of our mouths are things we later wish we could take back. It's important to consider your words carefully when speaking with a grieving person – not just in offering condolences, but also in offering assistance. For instance, if you say you'll call, be sure to follow up in a timely manner. In failing to do so, you place yourself outside that person's circle of trust. And no one likes the feeling of being abandoned, particularly after suffering a great loss.

Words and phrases to avoid

Even when our instincts to offer sympathy are genuine, at times the things we say may not have the intended effect. Here are several examples of words and phrases to avoid when speaking with a grieving person.

"You have other children."

Parents who have lost a child face a void unlike any other. While it may seem helpful to point to the remaining children, it doesn't help to lessen the pain of so great a loss.

"You'll be happy later."

The instinct to point to a more hopeful future may be natural, but it's important to give a grieving person the opportunity to feel and process pain. Trying to push a person past pain too swiftly can sometimes lead to the denial of the pain in order to present a "happy" face.

"It will be OK."

While it's true that people will adapt to the circumstances of loss, the days immediately following the death of a loved one are a time of drastic readjustment. Eventually, those feeling loss will reach a new "normal" but their lives will be forever altered.

"She is in a better place."

A family who has lost a beloved member feels that the best place for that person is still with them.
