Rest In Peace 2018

A look back at the year's final farewells.

by LINNEA CROWTHER | Legacy.com

In 2018, we've said goodbye to a president and his beloved; a preacher who elevated us and a scientist who brought the cosmos down to Earth; a celebrity chef and a movie heartthrob; and the Queen of Soul herself. Join us as we look back at notable lives lost this year.

Film & TV: We lost a Hollywood icon when Burt Reynolds, star of "Smokey and the Bandit" and "Deliverance," died, and he was one of many of our favorite actors who took their last bow this year. Memories of loveable sitcoms came flooding back after the deaths of "Frasier's" John Mahoney, "The Facts of Life's" Charlotte Rae, "Coach's" Jerry Van Dyke, and "M*A*S*H's" David Ogden Stiers. We loved to hate Katherine MacGregor when she played Harriet Oleson on "Little House on the Prairie," and we haggled alongside "Pawn Stars" patriarch Richard Harrison. Soap opera fans are missing Peggy McKay, who stepped away from a 33-year run on "Days of Our Lives" just two years before her death. And fans of Hollywood glamour remember Tab Hunter, a big screen heartthrob of the 1950s and '60s, and Margot Kidder, who played the perfect Lois Lane alongside Christopher Reeve in the 1978 "Superman" and its sequels.

Music: Aretha Franklin's death rocked the music world as we mourned the Queen of Soul and replayed old hits like "Respect" and "Natural Woman." She was joined by Roy Clark, the hit country singer who hosted "Hee Haw" for three decades, and Randy Scruggs, who was country music royalty as the son of Earl Scruggs. Otis Rush was a legendary guitarist in Chicago's blues scene, while Dolores O'Riordan led the Cranberries and sang alternative hits including "Zombie" and "Linger."

Politics: When former First Lady Barbara Bush died in April, we mourned her loss and sent strength to her husband, former President George H.W. Bush. When the 41st president died just seven months later, we were comforted to think they were together again. Another pillar of U.S. politics lost this year was Senator John McCain, who represented Arizona for three decades and was a headline-maker throughout. On the international level, Kofi Annan served as Secretary-General of the United Nations and won a Nobel Peace Prize.

Culture: People who shaped our culture in all kinds of ways died this year, from the Rev. Billy Graham, the prominent minister who counseled presidents, to Stephen Hawking, the brilliant theoretical physicist who brought us a better understanding of the universe even as he battled ALS. Two of NASA's Apollo astronauts, John Young and Alan Bean, were among the only human beings ever to set foot on the Moon, while Paul Allen revolutionized home computing when he co-founded Microsoft. Winnie Mandela fought for freedom in South Africa as an anti-apartheid activist. Ingmar Kamprad created a new kind of shopping experience when he founded IKEA; Charles Lazarus brought joy to the masses as founder of Toys R Us; and Kate Spade influenced our personal style with her iconic handbags.

Authors: Several iconic writers died this year, beginning with sci-fi legend Ursula K. Le Guin, known for groundbreaking books including "The Left Hand of Darkness." Tom Wolfe brought us "The Right Stuff" and "Bonfire of the Vanities," and Philip Roth wrote well-known novels including "Portnoy's Complaint" and "The Human Stain." Playwright and screenwriter Neil Simon created classics like "The Odd Couple" and "Biloxi Blues," while columnist Charles Krauthammer was one of the country's top conservative political pundits, thanks to his column in the Washington Post. Playwright Ntozake

Shange wrote one of the most influential plays of a generation, "For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide/When the Rainbow is Enuf." And screenwriter/novelist William Goldman may be best remembered for his whimsical fairy tale, "The Princess Bride."

Comics: Marvel Comics' fans were devastated when Stan Lee, who co-created many of the best known superheroes in comics, including Iron Man, Black Panther, and the Hulk, died. His death came just a few months after that of Steve Ditko, who worked alongside Lee to co-create Spider-Man and Doctor Strange. On the lighter side of the comic world, we lost Mort Walker, creator of newspaper strips "Beetle Bailey" and "Hi and Lois."

Media Personalities: Anthony Bourdain's death came as a shock and a great loss to the culinary world, which adored his adventurous romps through international cuisines on several popular TV shows. Art Bell hosted the cult classic paranormal radio show "Coast to Coast," while Carl Kasell was the unforgettable voice of NPR's "Wait Wait... Don't Tell Me!" And Robin Leach sold us on champagne wishes and caviar dreams as host of "TV's Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous."

Sports: Bruno Sammartino, known as "The Strongest Man in the World," was one of the all-time greats of professional wrestling. Stan Mikita was named one of the 100 greatest NHL players after his 20-year career with the Chicago Black Hawks—and Rusty Staub was one of the original stars of the Montreal Expos. ■

How Funeral Directors Help Families

Eight important tasks that the professionals will help you with.

by LINNEA CROWTHER | Legacy.com

A funeral director can be one of your most important allies in the days and weeks after a loved one's death. Whether the funeral was prepared for years in advance, or the death was unexpected and you're making all the arrangements in a grief-stricken hurry, there's so much you can lean on a funeral director for. Here are some of the primary things a funeral director helps a family with.

Transporting the body. When a death has occurred, the funeral home is one of the first phone calls you'll make. If your loved one died in the hospital, at home, or somewhere else, the funeral director will arrange for their body to be transported to the funeral home, where preparations for services will begin. Even when a death occurs far from home, in another state or country, the funeral director is the one who takes point on getting your loved one's body home.

Making funeral arrangements. When you contact the funeral home right after the death, you can also schedule a time to get together and make the arrangements for services and body disposition (burial, cremation, etc.). You'll talk about when and where services will take place, what type of visitation you want (if any), whether graveside services will be private, whether military honors will be presented, and so on. The funeral home is typically available as a location for services, but the funeral director can also help make arrangements for services at a church or other location.

Managing the services. Once all the arrangements are made, the funeral home also does the work to make sure those services you planned together run smoothly. They'll secure the locations and make sure all the timing works out. They'll find you the right musicians and funeral officiant if you wish. They'll arrange the displays of photo boards and mementos of your loved one that you've chosen to include. They'll have service programs printed and distribute them to guests. They'll manage the many flower arrangements that may be delivered. They can make arrangements for catering if you wish to have that as a part of services.

You've most likely seen funeral directors at funerals you've attended in the past—they may not be front and center, but they're very busy helping people get where they need to be, answering questions, and coordinating every last detail.

Writing and submitting an obituary for publication. You may choose to write your loved one's obituary—or they may have written their own, prior to their death—but if you prefer to leave that job to someone else, the funeral home can take care of writing the obituary based on information you provide. They can also submit the obituary, regardless of who wrote it, to your local newspapers as well as to papers in other areas where the deceased lived in the past.

Setting up a memorial fund. If you're planning on requesting memorial donations to the family to cover funeral expenses, or you'd like to set up any other sort of memorial fund in your loved one's name, the funeral director can make it happen. They can also collect donations at the funeral home—in person at services as well as those mailed in by friends who couldn't be there—and distribute them as you direct.

Tying up loose ends. You'll probably need multiple copies of the death certificate in the days and weeks after the death. You'll often use them as proof of the death as you settled your loved one's affairs. The funeral director can do what needs to be done to secure the death certificate for you. The funeral director will also notify the Social Security Administration of your loved one's death.

Helping you pre-plan your own (or a loved one's) funeral. If you've gone through setting up a funeral at the last minute, you may feel strongly about making sure things are better planned for the next one. A funeral director can work with you in advance to plan your own funeral or that of a loved one. Everything from locations to body disposition to fine details can be planned in advance, and you can even pay in advance to spare loved ones from financial headaches after death. If a family member is entering a nursing home and needs to do a spend-down of assets to qualify for aid, a funeral director can also help you with pre-paying for funeral services as part of the spend-down.

Connecting you with advice and support. A funeral director can point you toward local or online grief support resources to help you cope as you move past the funeral. And if there's something else you need in the wake of your loved one's death, and you're not sure where to turn, you might try asking the funeral director. They tend to have great connections and may be able to help you in ways you didn't expect. ■
